“ In the past I had really gone overboard for my daughter's birthday parties. However, last year we were really low on cash so I had to change that trend. I threw an under the sea party with 12 little girls and spent less than fifty dollars. Our living room is painted blue so I used that as the background. Then my daughter and I had a blast making fish, lobsters, and a giant octopus out of construction paper. We hung sea creatures all over the living room. We used a storage box and painted it gold to make a treasure chest and filled it with Easter grass (seaweed) and toys from the dollar store as prizes. For a game the girls had a limbo contest using a bamboo pole I bought for a few dollars at the craft store. They also went "fishing" with a pole made from a stick and some string with a magnet on the end. I made the fish out of construction paper and glued a metal paperclip to the back. Food was just pizza, chips, and soda. My daughter said it was the best party she ever had.

“ *Wow. I had never even considered this possibility. I mean, isn't conservation of energy and a working knowledge of thermodynamics enough to conclude, from first principles, that while we might well have enough energy at a given time, consumption cannot grow without limits. It should also be obvious that energy density matters.*

“ I put “needing” in quotes to highlight that, if needed for medical reasons, alternate forms of birth control are already covered by the private insurance industry. Also, to highlight, that those “not” needing alternative forms of birth control don’t serve a medical objective, but a social activity. In which case, why aren’t other social activities covered? We were talking about healthcare, right?

“ Excellent post! You are speaking the truth. We filled out all of the FAFSA loan papers for our son and since we are “middle class” and paid off our home (when the economy was good pre-2008) we ended up getting a “ParentPlus” loan in 2010, since we couldn’t qualify for any financial aid.

“ Mr. Vellardita is just doing his job a a negotiator and needs to justify his massive salary that the teacher's union is paying. Any reasonable teacher understands that the economy is in the toilet and that getting a regular paycheck, benefits and a pension is a pretty sweet deal these days.
